

The Widows Mite

“but she from the little she had has put in everything”

You are asked for nothing less than everything.

There is however a strange humility to the giving of all.

You cannot give more than you have.

There are those who seem to pay 20% more on their bills because all is purchased with credit

Attempting to give more than they have to acquire more than they need.

There are those who are consistently tired as a result of making efforts beyond their endurance.

Attempting to achieve more than they can physically endure and thus destroying both their health and what they are trying to do.

There are those who cannot be comfortable with what is there, but yearn for that which experience should have taught them is not going to happen.

Like my signing as a centre forward for Manchester United.

You are asked for nothing less than everything.

There is however a strange humility to the giving of all.

There are those who always hold back, and buy the cheaper product that never lasts as long.

Who do not respect their own dignity enough to get the stair lift or warm winter coat.

There are those who hide behind the false humility of never attempting.

Scared of getting it wrong, they never give their all in attempting to get it right.

There are those who hoard up their money, energy, emotions, talents.

Waiting for the day, hoping it comes before the grave

You are asked for nothing less than everything.

There is however a strange humility to the giving of all.

I cannot give more than I have

I cannot give more than I am

I am obliged to give all that I have

I am obliged to give all that I am

Like the widow giving all

There is great happiness to be found

In living within the possible

And in this place of real personal insight

Living to the full.
